What the teacher did

The teacher negotiated with other teachers that several computers would be sited in or near her room for the week. After the whole class demonstration in the Literacy Hour, using a computer linked to a large TV monitor, some children worked in pairs in the group time. Their work was shared in the plenary sessions, when the teacher discussed ways to scan and identify key points. Outside the Literacy Hour, pairs of children worked on other text examples relating to the Romans, and the summarised texts were used as part of the History topic. Since extra computers were available, the teacher decided that the children should work in pairs rather than small groups, but despite having additional access to computers, the children took far longer than the teacher had anticipated and the work continued into the next week.
